Cleaning House

IT PAYS TO BE GOOD. There is nothing particularly original about that statement, but it is one worth keeping in mind, and is as true as it was on the first day it was ever written in a copy book. It may not be the highest kind of a rule of conduct, but it's a simple one and easily remembered. Above all, it is practical, and that amounts to a good deal in this matter of-fact world. In the end, I believe it will outweigh all the essays and ethics of the reformers, and do more than anything else to bring about the millenium of advertising. There is always a certain proportion of men who will do right for right's sake, but even they, probably, are not displeased with the fact that it is no bad investment, and for the majority it is fortunate that common honesty and decency are not expensive.

it is fortunate that common honesty and decency are not expensive.

Every day the publisher is being more and more convinced that the cleaner his advertising columns are the more money he can make out of them, and when this knowledge becomes general the vicious ad will go out of business. To the credit of publishers be it said that most of them "clean house," because they believe it is right, but the time is coming when it will be done as a matter of pure business policy. Take the case of the Phornix, Arix. Republican, a paper that about a year ago decided to eliminate objectionable advertising and, in its own words, "expected no other reward than a satisfied conscience." Note the result as described in a recent editorial in that paper:

"The Republican has found other reward than the

than a satisfied conscience. Note the result as described in a recent editorial in that paper.

"The Republican has found other reward than the approval of the own conscience. The eliminated advertising has been followed by a considerably increased volume of decent advertising. The patent medicine people used to be tyrannical when the papers were clamoring for their business. They not only insisted upon the best positions, but designated the kind of matter that should appear next to their advertisements, and even proscribed certain other kinds of advertising on the same page. When the Republican began throwing out patent medicine advertisements the space thus cleared was taken by legitimate foreign advertising. The patent medicine people are now clamoring to get back into the Republican on any terms on 'any old' page. They are willing to legate the matter of position entirely to the foreign.

Nor is this all. Not only has the Republican increased its own value as an advertising medium, but the public has been quick to notice and appreciate the improvement, and has responded generously with cash.

improvement, and has responded generously with cash for subscriptions. Says the Republican, Within the period in which most of the advertising contearts copired and when they were dropped, there has been sleady and rapid increase in the Republican's vidus of circulation, as was shown by its published statement
